30th. The Emperor of Russia and the King of Prussia are both staying here, and dine with me every day.

July 3d. (To Fouehe.) See to it that no more abuse of Russia takes place, directly or indirectly. Everything points to our policy being brought into line with that of this Power on a permanent basis.

5th. The Queen of Prussia had decided ability, a good education and fine manners; it was she, really, had reigned for more than fifteen year.s; and, in spite of all my efforts and akill, she retained command of our conversation, and always got back to her subject, perhaps even too much so, and yet with perfect propriety and in a manner that aroused no antagonism. In truth, the matter was an important one for her, and time was short and precious.

I proceeded to call on her, but she received me on the tragic note, like Ghimene: — Sire, Justice! Justice! Magdeburg!—She continued after this fashion, which embarrassed me very much; at last, to shift the ground, I asked her to sit down, — there Ls nothing that cute into a tragic scene better, for when people are seated, it becomes u comedy. She had on a superb collar of pearls; so I complimented her on them:— Ah! what lovely pearla!—--

Oth. The beautiful Queen of Prussia dines with me to-night.

(To the Emperor of Russia.) I am Bending a summary to your Majesty of the difficulties our negotiators have met with, and a mezsotcrmine that disposes of them. I hope Your Majesty will approve, for I should be glad to hear that the treaty of peace can be signed this very day.

7th. (To Josephine.) The Queen of Prussia dined with
